Introduction

In the last two decades there have been several attempts to provide a comprehensive listing of all traceable public and private stations, halts, ticket platforms and other stopping places in Ireland, both North and South.

Despite much research over several years utilizing the resources of The Bodleian Library, Oxford, England, and those of Trinity College Library, Dublin, Ireland, there still remains an amount of work requiring completion. This principally consists of checking for the existence of, and where applicable, dates of use for obscure platforms, halts and crossing stops. In addition, the dates on which a few public stations were in use, particularly for freight traffic, are also lacking. Although this information has yet to be located, the editor feels that there is sufficient content to warrant a publication of some sort.

This information is provided as is. in the hope that it may be useful to researchers and others interested in railway history, while it has, in the main, been cross checked, it comes with absolutely no warranty whatsoever

Symbols and Abbreviations

- * After the station name, please refer to the appendix for further details
- B After station name, some or all information relating to this location from Bradshaw's timetables (usually first/last appearance in public timetables)
- F After station name, some or all information relating to this location from Falconer' s timetables (usually first/last appearance in public timetables)
- T After station name, some or all information relating to this location from Topham's timetables (usually first/last appearance in public timetables)
- PD Or other two letter combination after station name, those of the railway company responsible for originally opening that station.

Note.

The editor has from time to time used the names of nearby streets or roads to define the location of stations, these street/road names did not necessarily appear as part of the legend on the station nameboard. An example of this would be Bandon in County Cork where there were numerous stations and an exchange platform over the years.
